¹These changes reflect the extent to which individual farmers in Iran have been left to the designs of a centrally determined and imposed state policy, with little to no role being played through farmers' or their associations, and it is this policy, we feel, that is more deserving of criticism than the policy itself.

Finally, we will find that it was common for students and non-students alike to be very interested in the study of the environment, but that only students were likely to be active.

This outcome was in contrast with the data from the capital outflows, for the signs in country outflows were generally not significant, and increasing (decreasing) outflows are thought to be associated with higher (lower) growth. The reason for this is possibly related to the way we measured the capital outflows. In the data used, "direct" outflows (the flows in FDI and portfolio investment) are distinguished from "indirect" outflows (the flows in bank deposits and other investments).

There are two other factors that should be noted briefly in the application of PRA to the 1980s. First, the 1980s have been called the decade of the "new right." Although a responsibility shift cannot be attributed to a movement or movement, perhaps this new emphasis on individual control and choice has given rise to the PRA effort. Second, the movement toward a more
